Chan McLeod concentrates his practice on litigation and providing advice to corporations and associations on general legal matters. He has extensive experience defending product liability, premises liability, toxic tort, and mass tort cases for his clients.

He has extensive experience litigating and managing litigation, and has defended complex liability cases in federal and state courts across the country. Chan has experience as national coordinating counsel, handling national litigation strategy, overseeing the administration of local counsel litigation activities, and directing case resolution efforts in jurisdictions nationwide. He also has experience defending claims related to dioxins, polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, heavy metals, and wood treatment chemicals, and is well versed in the associated medical and scientific issues, including medical causation, disease process, and epidemiology. Chan has defended the interests of naval equipment manufacturers in mass tort litigation including fact development, naval records research, motion practice, and preparation of experts for deposition and trial.
